

A blood diamond is something that people hope they never have to use. However, it's easy to find out how these gems are made by the process of mining them. This is an accurate representation of what happens in each step of the process. Blood diamonds are commonly found internationally and many countries exploit this precious resource for monetary gain. The more money you make, the more diamonds you'll get (also known as "earning"). Diamonds can be sliced into smaller pieces that often times end up on your finger or even your forehead if you're not careful during the process of mining, which is dangerous work with little pay-off. There really isn't any safe place to find blood diamonds. There isn't much to do unless you're looking for alternative ways to make money. Some people mine diamonds by digging deep into the ground; others get into the business of buying and selling diamonds. It's believed that people who get into this business are usually involved in illegal activity like drug-trafficking, corruption, etc. The hardest part of this job is getting started. Until you learn how to mine blood diamonds, you have to take whatever money you can get in order to sustain yourself within the diamond business. If you have no experience with mining blood diamonds, it would be best if you take a different public service job or try another place to start your career in life.
